Is It Obscurity or the Polemics of Symbolism?:
A Study of Wole Soyinka's Poetry

Stella Okoye-Ugwu

Department of English and Literary Studies, University of Nigeria, Nsukka, Nigeria.

Author’s contribution

The sole author designed, analyzed, interpreted and prepared the manuscript.

Article Information

DOI: 10.9734/AJL2C/2018/43680

Editor(s):
(1) Dr. Malissa Maria Mahmud, Senior Lecturer, Center for American Education, Sunway University, Malaysia.

Reviewers:
(1) Alan Garfield, University of Dubuque, USA.
(2) Gabriel Bazimaziki, University of Rwanda, Rwanda.
(3) Saidna Zulfqar Bin-Tahir, Universitas Iqra Buru, Indonesia.
(4) Shweta Saxena, Amity University, India.
(5) Azman Che Mat, Universiti Teknologi MARA, Malaysia.

Complete Peer review History: http://www.sciencedomain.org/review-history/26285

Received 11th June 2018
Accepted 27th August 2018
Published 19th September 2018

ABSTRACT

Some critics and scholars have overblown the issue of obscurity in the poetry of Wole Soyinka. These critics have succeeded in making a myth out of this perceived obscurity. Admittedly, his poems are not easily accessible to the average reader, but with a little effort, one finds them as academically engaging as well as rewarding. Symbolism is a major feature of his poetry. It is difficult to come across a direct statement in his poems. Like the symbolist poets, he places his faith in the personal, the subjective and the associative. He portrays the realities of his experiences through the use of images and symbols which evoke a certain emotional feeling in the reader. Despite the charges of obscurity and impenetrability made against Soyinka by the critics, it is very rewarding to study his poetry. Soyinka has enormous experiences that he wants to convey; and to do this effectively, he uses an assemblage of imagery, symbolism, and allusion to delineate his poetic trajectory. The present thesis I posit is that Soyinka’s poetry is neither difficult nor obscure but rather glows with a rich resource of symbolism in the order of the symbolist poets. This critical inquiry is anchored on the concept of symbolism.

*Corresponding author: E-mail: stella.okoye-ugwu@unn.edu.ng;
Keywords: Soyinka; obscurity; symbolism; symbol; Ogun.

1. INTRODUCTION

A symbol carries meaning beyond itself and represents another. Akwanya, citing Kristeva and Jung distinguishes “two systems of representation: representation by the symbol and by the sign, each one constituted by a specific function, which she calls ‘ideologemes’” [1]. Akwanya adds that both Goethe and Coleridge stressed that symbol presents only one image, remains indefinite, but boundlessly suggestive in its significance. Jung sees the symbol as something ‘unknown’ that cannot be made clear and precise.

Symbolism is a major feature in the poetry of Wole Soyinka. Consequently, just as he says of Okigbo’s poetry, Izevbaye finds “three features of the symbolist theory that are relevant to the discussion”, and I must add, also of the poetry of Wole Soyinka. These are “a rejection of ‘meaning’ or ‘communication’ in the ordinary sense, an emphasis on the poet’s unity of being, and thirdly, an attempt to preserve the integrity of art by an aesthetic withdrawal ….” Symbolism may mean different things to different people. But, for the purposes of this paper, the term has been used in the same sense as it was used by Austin Warren: “symbolism may be defined as imagery understood to imply a conceptual meaning” [2].

According to Symons, the aim of any artist who writes in the symbolist tradition is “not so much to communicate his thoughts to others as to give them suggestions which will induce them to think and dream for themselves” [3]. The poetry of Soyinka has yielded itself to many contested readings and criticisms. Some scholars and critics have described his poetry as obscure and difficult to understand. However, one can find Soyinka’s poetry neither obscure nor difficult. In his poetry, a preponderance of figurative images can be obtained that yield poetic figurations and colourations. In his epistemological essay, “The Fourth Stage,” Soyinka writes, “Yoruba myth syncretizes Obatala, god of purity, god also of creation, (but not of creativity) with the first deity, Orisan-la” [4]. His avid interest in the world of mythology is also further elucidated in this essay. Soyinka not only makes prodigious use of myths and rituals in his creative works, particularly, in his poetry but goes beyond of that. He moves on to place works on a global map. There is always an invocation and a retreat to the Yoruba gods; such as Ogun, Sango, Atunda and others. For the purposes of this critical inquiry, myth is to be used in the sense that Northrop Frye has used it, as:

“The union of ritual and dream in a form of verbal communication…. The myth accounts for and makes communicable, the ritual and the dream. Ritual, by itself, cannot account for itself: it is pre-logical, pre-verbal, and in a sense pre-human…. Myth, therefore, not only gives meaning to ritual and narrative to dream: it is the identification of ritual dream, in which the former is seen to be the latter in movement…. Ritual is the archetypal aspect of ‘mythos’ and dream, the archetypal aspect of ‘dianoia’” [5].

Ofeimun, in his In Search of Ogun: Soyinka in SPITE OF NIETZSCHE, insists that,

“The stories, as Soyinka has authenticated and audited them, whether from the standpoint of a creation myth in which Ogun is the path-maker who cleared the way from the gods to humankind, or the entrepreneur who brought the fire of civilization to lift humanity from barbarism, or the war-monger who protects the weak but could also devour them in sheer gore-mongering, was fascinating because of what he added to it” [6].

Ojaide in The Poetry of Wole Soyinka, bemoans the paucity of criticisms on Soyinka’s poetry as against his works on other genres. Ojaide is of the opinion that “Soyinka is a gifted writer who holds opinions that should be heard. He may be regarded as a maverick highbrow poet who is difficult and obscure. But, when examined from the standpoints of voice and viewpoint, however, I believe that his poetry is quite accessible” [7].

Booth citing Horcart in The life-giving myth and other essays, argues that all human societies and organisations are myth-suffused and every myth is necessarily backed by rituals in this sense. In the same vein, Sperber, in Structuralism and Since: From Levi-Strauss to Derrida is of the view that ‘most cultural phenomena, such as technology or political organization, must submit to a variety of ecological and sociological constraints. Again, myths, which are orally transmitted and culturally selected narratives, tend to ignore any determinations other than intellectual ones, and even these seem to remain relatively loose [8]. Hence, myths should provide an exceptional insight into the spontaneous work of the human mind.

Quoting Jeyifo in Research in African Literature, Maduakor observes that Soyinka’s works have “an elaborate sub-structure of myth, ritual and symbolism which transform them into ‘haunting, apocalyptic creations of the imagination’ [9]. In another work of his, Wole Soyinka: An Introduction to his Writing, Maduakor argues that Soyinka has immortalised the energies of his god, Ogun, in Idanre and Ogun Abibiman. Ogun emerges as the revolutionary archetype. In Idanre, he is situated in the context of Yoruba mythology where he distinguished himself as the protagonist of the abyss and as both the hero and the monster at the Battle of Ire [10]. In Ogun Abibiman, Ogun’s mythic attributes are seen from a contemporary perspective. Machel decides in 1976 to declare Mozambique at war with the white minority regime of former “Rhodesia” and sees Ogun as the warlord who is the Commander of the forces of all Abibiman. He is however assisted by his historical counterpart, the legendary Chaka, the Zulu warlord [11].

Soyinka focuses on the god, Ogun in most of his literary oeuvres. In his writings, he expresses the belief in Ogun as a tutelary deity for great minds all over the world. Ogun is easily differentiated from Obatala and Sango in the Yoruba pantheon. For Idowu, Obatala is seen to represent a general placidity which is perceived to be the harmonious essence of creation, Ogun’s factor is seen as more energetic. Soyinka believes that Obatala represents all the elements that make for harmony. In contrast, Ogun is seen as the embodiment of challenge and the hubristic impulse of the rebel. He is also the embodiment of creativity as opposed to creation. In relation to Sango, the two gods are differentiated in terms of the type of justice they represent. Whereas Sango’s justice is primarily retributive, Ogun stands for a humane but rigidly restorative justice [12].

Soyinka evokes the serenity of Obatala and the retributive justice of Sango but avoids grounding his theory on the tragic potentials of either of the two gods. He mediates on a wide range of issues, ranging from the relations between ritual and drama to the personal and cultural correlatives necessary for success in a confusing and potentially tragic world. Comparing Soyinka’s use of the Ogun myth with the writings of early settlers in America, such as Frederick Jackson Turner, Garuba argues that the notion of a frontier which needs to be crossed or pushed back is a definitive topos of cultures defining their identities. The notion of the frontier, Garuba considers, significant to Soyinka as he mediates on the relationships between his culture’s conceptual system and its place in the world. Unlike the American frontier, which was a physical one, Soyinka engages with a spiritual one [13].

Several towns and dynasties attempt to link foundational narratives to Ogun as a means of political validation so that even the tale associating Ogun with Ire is a manifestation of the political inflections of Ogun myths. In the “Jalal” chants, Ogun is defined as ‘a man of the people,’ ‘a Robin Hood’ or ‘Aeneas,’ living among ordinary people and suffering their tribulations with them.

Ofeimun argues again that “all the gods, quintessentially, function within what Nietzsche describes as the chthonic realm. He perceives Soyinka’s fourth stage as a zone in mythic space, distinct from but encompassing the world of the living, the dead and unborn”. Jeyifo opines that, so inexorable and hegemonic is the personage of Ogun at the heart of Soyinka’s art that the search for the will of Ogun could indeed be viewed as the most logical means of hermeneutic access to his literary, philosophical and social vision.

Soyinka, in navigating the trajectories of his writings, not only re-writes the terms of Yoruba symbolism and mythology but does so in a deftly expressed aesthetic and political ideology. He expresses this explicitly in defining the agenda of Myth, Literature and the African World, “the simultaneous act of eliciting from history, mythology and literature, for the benefit of both genuine aliens and alienated Africans, a continuing process of self-apprehension” [14].

2. TEXTUAL ANALYSIS

Wole Soyinka, in his “Preface to Idanre”, says that the inspiration for the poem, “Idanre,” came as a result of a walk he took, in the middle of the night, amidst “presences such as dilate the head and erase known worlds” to the Idanre hills.

“We returned at dawn, the sun was rising just below the hut where we had sheltered on the outward journey. The palm wine girl still waited, the only other human being awake in the vast present night, yet an eternal presence whose charity had earthed me from the sublimating essence of the night…. I took my leave of her, my companions had vanished, I returned home wet from overladen boughs, brittle as the herald lightning to a storm. By nightfall that same day, Idanre was completed" [15].

The 'wine girl' is said to be Oya, the mythic wife of Ogun, and later, the wife of Sango, the god of lightning and electricity. On a superficial level, she is seen as a girl who was killed in a car accident.

In Idanre, Soyinka attempts to revive an ancient Yoruba legend which is at once the poem and also a metaphor for the Nigerian situation at the time. Implicit in Soyinka’s metaphysics is that death has a positive value. Death, when it’s consciously awaited, acts as a pivot that showcases the energetic creative impulse. This means that Soyinka portrays death and growth as opposite sides of the same coin. In "Abiku", the reader confronts the idea that “the ripest fruit was saddest.” This is simply a metaphorical representation of the idea that life, at its fullest, is closest to death. It is basically an adaptation of the myth of the eternal return of the individual back to earth. Consequently, re-incarnation is a mythological symbol that features in Soyinka’s poetry. He incorporates the abyss into his cyclic conception of existence. His inclination towards the belief that the past informs the present emanates from his philosophy of life-death-life, or growth-decay-growth, or ripeness-rust-ripeness cycle.

Here, Ogun visits the earth to fertilise her, since he controls the seasons as the god of harvest. On this particular visit, he is accompanied by his acolyte, the poet himself seeking creative inspiration. His other exploits in the context of Yoruba mythology are recounted in the course of the poem. The journey itself is a symbolic re-enactment of the god’s passage through the abyss of transition. The abyss is a thick undergrowth of matter and non-matter that separates the realm of the gods from the abode of men. In the first stanza of the poem’s opening section, “Deluge”, the reader encounters:

> “Gone, and except for horsemen briefly
> Thawed, lit in deep cloud mirrors, lost
> The Skymen of Void’s regenerate Wastes
> Striding vast across
> My still inchoate earth”

Consequently, we also find the mythic cyclic nature of death, deftly captured by Soyinka, in the enigmatic poem, “Post Mortem.” In this case, the metaphor of death transcends beyond the physical death, or extinction of life, but, to the suffering of life and hardship. The protagonist urges the reader to “let us love all things of grey; grey slabs, grey scalpel, one grey sleep and form, grey images.” Grey colour also symbolises imprisonment and incarceration.

Interestingly, in the poem, “Dawn”, there are two apparent levels of meaning. The poem illustrates Soyinka’s preoccupation with the destructive and creative potentials of the god, Ogun. Nwahunanya posits that the poem is indicative of the painful and destructive nature of creation, and the paradox that destruction is necessary preliminary to creation. He further asserts that,

> “It is known that the palm tree is a phallic symbol of Ogun; palm fronds too look in outline like the sun and are collectively associated with the coming of Ogun. When we realize that the silhouette of a palm tree’s crown resembles the sun in shape, and that the sun occupies a majestic position in the solar system, the comparison between Ogun’s majesty, the sun’s majesty, the palm tree’s majesty in the midst of other trees, and the poet’s majestic position among men slowly emerges. But one needs the mythological background of associations in Yoruba belief to unravel this [17].”

In the poem, “Death in the Dawn,” one comes across “may you never walk when the road is famished.” This may appear superficial and ordinary unless the reader knows that Ogun is the custodian god of the road. On a physical level, the road lies famished, waiting for unfortunate travellers, but, mythically, it is indeed, Ogun, who waits famished. The myth and ritual deployed by the use of gods, give depth and substance to Soyinka’s works. It is however in Idanre, that he gives a most vivid image of Ogun. The poem is replete with translations of the original Yoruba myth. This line is quite remarkable: "Ogun path-maker, he who goes fore where other gods have turned."

The above line is based on the myth of creation. It relates to the story of the time when the gods were coming from heaven. They could not get a clear path into the world and when they could have lost all hopes, Ogun came and created a path for them. However, the image of Ogun presented in Idanre is that of a cruel, bloody, and bitter god, who,

"with wretches of last year’s supper paved his roads with shells, milestones of breathless bones.
Ogun is a demanding god"

Ogun must certainly be a demanding god. He takes sacrifices of both men and dogs on a regular basis. If he fails to get his usual sacrifices, he retaliates in a very terrible way; by exacting stiff penalties. The delineation of Ogun as a bloodthirsty god is quite in consistency with the belief of his worshippers and with the myths surrounding him.

Ogun is the god of war. The protagonist describes vividly in Idanre, how the elders of Ire went to beg Ogun to be their king. After “clearing a path to man,” he was made a king of deities:

“His task was ended, he declined the crown of deities, sought retreat in the height but Ire laid siege to divine withdrawal alas for diplomatic arts, the elders of Ire prevailed; He descended and they crowned him king”.

Ogun led his men to war and it was a very brilliant outing. He fought rather gallantly. The people of Ire, the children of Ogun, “reaped red earth that harvest”. His attire for the event is not left out in the narration. The speaker does not hide the faults of Ogun, even though he constantly refers to Ogun as “my god Ogun”. While presenting the picture of how Ogun went to war, the speaker says,

“Ogun is the lascivious god who takes seven Gourdlets to war: one for gun-powder, one for Charms, two for palm wine and three air-sealed in Polished bronze make storage for his sperms”

In his blood-lust, we find Ogun slaying his own men. He was obviously drunk and did not realise his atrocious behaviour. Consequently, the people cried, “Your men, Ogun! Your men,” but he was deaf. Still, they cried, “Lust-blind god, gone drunk. Hunter monster-deity, you destroy your men!”

These are all perceptions of the traditional mythology of the Yoruba people. Soyinka has indeed brought life to the mythology of his people. He has indeed immortalised Ogun in the hearts of his readers. Idowu asserts that “Ogun, reckless and ferocious, opted for an isolated life on the hill (Ori-Oke). At last, he decided to live among the community.” In Idanre and Other Poems, there is a list of the deities formed by the wiles of Atunda. Soyinka explains that Atunda was the slave of the highest deity. The deity’s name, which the reader first encounters, explains his place in the mythology of the Yoruba. Atunda, which means re-creator, was is said to be responsible for the multiple god-head. The remaining deities formed are: “Orisanla, Orunmila, Esu, Ifa”.

In the poem, “Abiku,” we find the myth of eternal return. This is a poem based on the myth of the changeling child. The delineation of this mythology in the writing of the poem is very remarkable and depicts the whole essence of the poem. The speaker goes on:

“In vain your bangles cast
Charmed circles at my feet
I am Abiku, calling for the first
And the repeated time

Must I weep for goats and cowries
For palm oil and the sprinkled ash?
Yams do not sprout in amulets
To earth Abiku’s limbs

Once and the repeated time, ageless
Though I puke, and when you pour
Libations, each finger points near
The way I came”.

This Abiku is very tough and defiant and mocks at the efforts of the parents to retain him. Here, the abiku is very much unlike Clark’s abiku. This abiku taunts and torments the parents, to the utmost chagrin of all. The myth surrounding the abiku phenomenon is that abiku is a child born to die. He is believed to be a member of a fraternity of evil spirits, which are recycled in a constant cycle of birth-death-rebirth. This particular myth is upheld in many parts of Nigeria, and indeed, Africa. In Igbo mythology, it is known as Ogbanje.
The symbolic performance in “Abiku” is seen where the parents of the changeling child offer sacrifices of palm oil, cowries, akara balls, goats, coconuts, and many other items to the other members believed to be living in the water, to let Abiku stay with her family in this particular sojourn on earth. In defiance, abiku says,

“Brand me
Deeply on the breast – you must know him
when Abiku calls
Again
I am the squirrel teeth, cracked
The riddle of the palm; remember
This, and dig me deeper still into
The god’s swollen foot

The ripest fruit was saddest;
Where I crept, the warmth was cloying.
In silence of webs, Abiku moans, shaping
Mounds from the yolk”.

3. CONCLUSION

Soyinka deploys the technique of symbolism in moving from the particular to universal. He portrays the realities of his experience through the use of images and symbols. Daniger and Johnson note that the use of the symbolic method “can suggest general human experiences in a concrete form. The writer can appeal to the ideas and emotions of which the reader is not fully conscious” [18]. “Death in the Dawn”, could have been just another poem on accidents, but for the metaphorical inclination and the prodigious use of symbols. To this extent, the poem consequently takes on the universal air in the masterful strokes of Soyinka. For Soyinka, “Ogun had become a twentieth Century deity, who superintended not only over iron foundries that gave rise to modern civilization but other scientific pursuits, beyond metallurgy, in electricity, electronics and related feats” [6]. In his poetry, Soyinka appropriates Yoruba traditional imageries and symbolism and transforms them into haunting apocalyptic paradigms of universal truth. He manipulates the elements of symbolism to suit his convenience and purpose. In the dynamics of his literary oeuvre, Soyinka succeeds in moving his poetry beyond the mere rhetoric of mythos and transcends it to a global phenomenon.

Obaje’s opinion about Achebe’s poetry is also applicable to Soyinka’s poetry. He says that “the poet, as a historian and a psychologist who understands his people very well, presents poems of social and spiritual regeneration” [19]. This is as true in the metaphysics of Chinua Achebe’s Beware Soul Brother, as it is in the convolutions and mythos of the corpus of the poetry of Wole Soyinka. Like Soyinka himself infers, in his book, Power, Hydoprus and Other Toxic Mutations, “whoever calls himself or herself a trained historian, invokes the possession of forensic skills, and with all the intellectual responsibility that such a calling demands” [20]. The thesis posited in the present study is that Soyinka’s poetry is neither difficult nor obscure. It is rather a rich resource of symbolism and myth, and in effect, very rewarding to study.

COMPETING INTERESTS

Author has declared that no competing interests exist.

REFERENCES

© 2018 Okoye-Ugwu; This is an Open Access article distributed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution License (http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0), which permits unrestricted use, distribution, and reproduction in any medium, provided the original work is properly cited.

Peer-review history:
The peer review history for this paper can be accessed here:
http://www.sciencedomain.org/review-history/26285